CONSUL DELAPLAIN

Comes Home From Demarara for a Needed Rest.

CLIMATE DID NOT AGREE WITH HIM.

He Arrives at Midnight, but Receives a Warm Welcome Nevertheless—A Talk with him about British Guiana and its Population—He will Remain here Until his Health is Restored.

United States Consul L. S. Delaplain arrived home on the B. & O. road from Washington at midnight last night. Since he returned from Georgetown, Demarara, British Guiana, where he represents Uncle Sam's interests, he has been in New York and Washington on official business. Late as was the hour of his arrival in Wheeling he was still met by a large number of warm friends, who extended him a cordial welcome home. Among these was an INTELLIGENCER reporter, to whom, however, he did not talk very freely, partly because of the numerous handshakes, but mainly on account of the rule of the department of state which forbids consuls from saying much that is interesting in other publications than their own reports.

The story current among his friends that he brought with him a pocket monkey proved to be no joke. He sent a small monkey ahead, but the one he has with him, and carries in his overcoat pocket, is a marmoset, a member of the smallest species known. It is not larger than a medium-sized rat, but has a curious humanlike head and face and a tail which a spectator is likely to mistake for a cord to keep it from escaping. The tail is twice as long as the body.

Mr. Delaplain's stay at home is somewhat indefinite. He has sixty days' leave, and has come home to build up his health, shattered by the climate, which did not agree with him and seldom does with North Americans. He had a long sick spell, and shows its effects yet. He wears a full beard, trimmed a la Carnot, which gives an odd look to his physiognomy.

Speaking of the interview with him printed in New York, an extract from which was given in the INTELLIGENCER, Mr. Delaplain said he and his predecessor in the office, Dr. Carroll, and Bert Hazlett, of this city, were talking in a New York hotel when the proprietor introduced a man who was greeted courteously, and then the conversation continued. The next morning it was in the paper, and the gentleman was found to be a reporter. The rules of the department very strictly forbid free talk by consuls, but under the circumstances this interview was overlooked.

Mr. Delaplain hopes to be transferred to a more salubrious climate, though so far nothing definite has been arranged to that end. He says the death rate exceeds the births vastly in British Guiana, and the population is kept up by immigration and the bringing in of East Indian coolies. These men find their condition much worse than slavery. They are indentured for five years at 12½ cents a day, out of which they must pay their board or support their families, pay for medical attendance and all other expenses. Of course they have not a cent at the end of five years. Then if they work five years more they are given free passage home. It is evident from what Mr. Delaplain says that he thinks a great deal which he does not say.

If hearty greetings will help to brace up a man when convalescent, he certainly ought to be well soon, for his welcome home is very warm.
